or dry sandy nature. But whatever be the kind of soil, it ought neither to be in too poor nor in too rich a condition; because, in the latter case, the flax is apt to grow too luxuriant, and to produce a coarse sort; and in the former case, the plant, from growing weakly, affords only a small produce. If there be ground at a small depth below the surface of the soil, it is thought by some to be better, as is the case in Zealand, which

son advanced or the earth very processed, the earth is pressed firmly to crease, and they are thereby stimulated to germinate sooner, and the drought is kept on some soils, and in wet or stormy seasons, flax is apt to be laid, to stand that which some cultivators run across the flax field slender poles. In stakes, a better method is to run small ropes across the field, both, I imagine, and breadth.

The capsules are then broken, and the seed is removed by threshing, in order to separate the remaining seeds. The whole of which, as well as the former, should be carefully examined, winnowed and cleaned. When the seed is laid up, it must be frequently stirred and ventilated, to prevent its heating. Experience has afforded a considerable profit by the use of this method, and also by having the seed broken for sale in bags.
